The term adivasi, i.e. 'aboriginal' - those who inhabited ab origine the Indian subcontinent - in contemporary language refers to the tribal ethnic minorities of India. They include a rich kaleidoscope of cultures, languages and traditions across the millennial history of this marvelous country which have often been unfairly marginalized in society. In fact, the Indian Government defines Scheduled Tribes not only on the basis of a distinctive religion and culture, but also according to general conditions of backwardness and relative geographical isolation. The term defines all those communities who, thanks to archaic sheep and farming techniques, still live in the dense Indian jungle and in remote Himalayan valleys. In the contemporary world, the adivasi have adopted different approaches to modernity, in particular those living close to urban or suburban areas. The peculiar traits of art, folklore and local handicrafts are now coalescing around these ethnic groups a proud sense of identity that resists the prevalent global trends of homologation. The exhibition shows pieces which are part of the rich collection of Roberta Ceolin. It wants to be a journey through photographs, paintings and other expressions of adivasi art of three different ethnicities, located almost at the antipodes of India (Rathva and Rabari in Gujarat and Rajasthan and Toda in Tamil Nadu). The images, moments of truly experienced magic, stop the time of this extraordinary world. Through their hints and suggestions they seem able to tell us the unsaid, throwing light on what at first sight appears invisible.

India has been for seventy years the largest democracy in the world. It is one of the fastest growing emerging economic powers. India is the country with the largest youth in the world - 650 millions of women and men with age below 25; one million of young persons entering each month the job market. This new generation is the carrier of a new culture, new identities, new initiatives; it is changing India and will have an impact over the world. But contemporary India is almost unknown to the Italian audience - or it is seen through the biasing lens of stereotypes and commonplace.

Ca' Foscari University and the Italian Embassy in Delhi are organizing an event that will open a new conversation with contemporary India, introducing some of its emerging, vibrant creative communities: startup entrepreneurs, young fashion and textile designers, art and heritage institutions engaged in innovative initiatives.
